We measured the effects of right bundle-branch block induced by transvenous catheter-guided AV nodal ablation on left ventricular diastolic performance using a rapid atrial-synchronized cineangiographic technique. In 6 patients, the initial rate of left ventricular filling was reduced to less than 50% of normal, in 10 patients it was reduced to less than 60% of normal, and in 7 patients, it was reduced to less than 80% of normal. In 8 of the 13 patients, the reduction in the left ventricular filling rate was detected after ablation. The initial rate of left ventricular filling was increased to more than 150% of normal after ablation in 5 of the 13 patients. In one patient, a late rate of left ventricular filling increased to 150% of normal in spite of normal systolic function. In another patient, left ventricular filling was normal, but total peripheral resistance increased to more than 10 times normal, probably due to a direct effect of the right bundle-branch block. These results indicate that not only immediate but also late abnormalities of left ventricular filling may occur after AV nodal ablation. Our results are compatible with the hypothesis that AV nodal ablation results in complete atrioventricular block and increases sympathetic drive to the heart.
