The mass of ribosomes is estimated at 2. 1200 molecules in mammalian cells, which is 13,000 times the number of the other proteins. Since the ribosomal subunits do not need to be folded into their correct three-dimensional structures before they enter the ribosome, ribosomal proteins can be produced in response to environmental signals, and also synthesized before their final assembly. These observations imply that ribosomal proteins may be essential and multifunctional components of the ribosome.
